News is about things that happen, not things that don't happen. We never see a journalist saying to the camera, "I'm reporting live from a country where a war has not broken out" or a city that has not been bombed, or a school that has not been shot up. As long as bad things have not vanished from the face of the earth, there will always be enough incidents to fill the news, especially when billions of smartphones turn most of the world's population into crime reporters and war correspondents. And among the things that do happen, the positive and negative ones unfold on different timelines. Trump was the beneficiary of a belief near universal in American journalism that "serious news" can essentially be defined as "what's going wrong".

Introduction. Journalism has long been regarded as an important force in government, so vital to the functioning of a democracy that it has been portrayed as an integral component of democracy itself. In 1841, Thomas Carlyle wrote, "Burke said there were Three Estates in Parliament; but, in the Reporters' Gallery yonder, there sat a Fourth Estate more important far than they all" (On Heroes and Hero Worship). News media also foster a sense of community between groups that might otherwise see themselves as distinct. Media have presented relatively local events, such as natural disasters, as matters of national and even international concern.

A former senior staff journalist and bureau chief with News Limited's The Sunday Mail newspaper in Queensland, Dr Lamble has been the Queensland finalist in three categories of the Walkley Awards for journalism, including sections for the best investigative article, best coverage of a current story and most outstanding contribution to journalism in all media. Dr Lamble's research interests are in the fields of journalism education, journalism methodology, computer-assisted reporting, converged news reporting, investigative journalism, feature writing, history, freedom of information
