Unfortunately, Publisher doesn't have a viewer for opening and viewing Publisher (.pub) files. But if you want to send a publication or receive a publication in email, you have some options. Sending a publication. If you send publications to people who don't have Publisher installed on their computers, you can try: Converting the publication to a PDF file, and sending it as an attachment in email. Posting the publication to a website and sending a link to readers. Convert Authors and publishers can be individuals or organizations, including companies. (Web masters put things on the site but do not usually decide what goes on all but the smallest websites. They often just carry out others'™ decisions.) Sites that do not identify an author or publisher are generally considered less credible for many purposes, including for term papers and other high-stakes projects.Â In books the identity of the publisher is traditionally on the back of the title page. Sometimes it helps to look for whether a site belongs to a single person or to a reputable organization. Because many colleges and universities offer blog space to their faculty, staff, and students that uses the university's™ web domain, this evaluation can require deeper analysis than just looking at the address.

Microsoft Publisher is a desktop publishing application (program). It is made by Microsoft and it is part of Microsoft Office. Publisher is similar to Word except that it places the emphasis on page layout and design (rather than writing text and proof reading). With Publisher, you can create a variety of publication types. For example, you can make brochures, newsletters, postcards and greeting cards as well as normal, 'Word-like' documents. Publisher's file extension is .pub.
