"ARTIST STATEMENT:

"I've been painting since my early teens in the 1950's. With a half century of work to consider, certain patterns are discernible. I have forever admired the great Realists. There is a basic visual magic in the ability of pigments to credibly translate our 3-dimensional world to the flat 2-dimensional world of paper and canvas. A good painting allows us to momentarily enter another's consciousness, and implies dimensions beyond what we can normally see. Painting is therefore a spiritual exercise, requiring imagination to create credibility. Beyond that, the power of this translation depends on the subject and the particular point of view (physical and psychological) of the painter."

"With the intent to share my pleasures, I have concentrated on the things of the world I most enjoy looking at. These usually exhibit forms that are the product of a life force being acted upon by a set of natural laws (gravity, decay, erosion) over their given life span. These are the most beautiful forms I know, and by repeated examination, the most meaningful. In nature this meaning is often only momentarily revealed -when the season, the weather and the light conspire to illuminate it. No one can paint fast enough to capture these moments on site, so I employ field photography for this purpose, and the comfort and convenience of my studio for working out the translation."

"My paintings are often superficially characterized as "photographic", but they are very different from the field photographs they come from. Just as fine photography involves much more than aiming a camera and pressing the shutter, fine painting requires an elaborate set of transformations. The result I aim for is original and credible, free of sentimentality and cliché, and distinctively my own."
